"If this logical argument does not convince him of the error of his ways, we then bring all possible influences to bear upon his brewer, and if possible persuade him not to sell to any retailers who cut under the regular prices. In most cases the brewer falls in with our views hearfily and shuts off the sale to the three-cent dives, though there are five or six brewers who make a rehapier grade of beer, and who refuse to assist us in this good movement.

cheap whiskey, and that's where the 'moonshine' stuff comes into play."

James Murray, a retailer, at Grand and Essex streets, has charge of the efforts to close these dives in his precinct, the Eleventh.

"The worst feature of this three-cent trade," said he, "is the moral depravity fostered by it. I have been in the business more than twenty years, and I have an inborn prejudice against it.

"Every day I see children of five and six years going in and out of these three-cent places with palls and pitchers, 'rushing the growler' for sottish parents, who have sufficient pride left to wish to hide their disgrace, though in doing so they degrade their own or their neighbor's children.

"We are having great success, though it is slow work. When I began in this section, six months ago, there were thirty-one places where beer was sold for three cents. Now there are but two such places, and very soon there won't be any at all."

Mr. Murray said that in his opinion the liquor dealers themselves were better fitted to cope with this evil than the clergy, though he was very glad to see the latter laboring in the same direction.
